As shown in FIG. 1, a distributed file system 10 typically includes two or more storage units 12. Storage units 12 may be hard disk drives, optical disk drives, flash drives, tape drives, etc. The storage units 12 may also be in different locations. For example, a storage unit 12 in each node 14 of a computer cluster may be used for file management. As another example, a storage unit 12 in a remote node 16 may be used as a backup unit for a node 14. It should be noted that the terms node and host interchangeably. A node 14 is a type of host, and a host is a type of node. It should be noted that both host and node may be implemented as computer components. However, a host generally refers to a computer which is used for one or more tasks and a node generally refers to a computer which is part of a larger computer system, for example a cluster. As shown in FIG. 1, a host 12, a remote node 16, and a storage unit 18 are connected by a network 20. The nodes 14 and 16 may have access to a centralized file system 22, such as a UNIX file system. The file system 22 is not shown in FIG. 1. A file system generally refers to software which manages files. A file system typically implements a set of standard structures and protocols for storing and accessing files. One type of file system is a file system which includes an NFS file system. A remote file system is generally a file system which includes a UNIX file system.
