The government yesterday adopted two rules that will govern the market, known as China Unicom, and which will go ahead come 9 May 2011. The rules are expected to come into force in June that year. The first rule, which has been under consideration since last March, bars Chinese web services operators from discriminating between customers based on the amount of traffic they generate. "We think this rule is a milestone for the Chinese web services industry," said Tony Liu, vice-president of New Voices, a Cambridge, Massachusetts, company, which tracks the market. The second rule will essentially state that China Unicom will be the only carrier that can be used to access online services. That would mean that if China Unicom were to change the terms of service, including the prices, of its services, operators would be barred from offering a similar service. Meanwhile, the government has also allowed Chinese operators to offer services to foreigners, provided they have agreed to meet the standards of the new rules. And it gave a go ahead to 570a42141b
