What's a good way to know when a model is overfitting? The fact that it works well on training data does not imply that it will work well on the test data, especially if the test data are a different distribution than the training data. Overfitting not only hurts the predictive ability of the model but also can cause bias. If the data distribution is a fat-tailed distribution, the model becomes biased towards underestimating the density of the data. If the data is like the distribution of a normal distribution, the model tends to overfit the training data. You need to know whether the model is good enough to predict density on the test set. What are some methods for evaluating model overfitting? One simple way to check is to use the test error as the goodness of fit. Overfitting occurs when the test error is low on the training set but high on the test set. So what is the best way to measure the goodness of fit? The testing error would be the ratio of test error to training error. This is called an empirical error rate. The problem is that the test error and training error need to be on the same scale, so that you can compare them. How can you make the train error and test error the same? Some people use a scale of the inverse of the number of training points. But you may have a problem when the training set is very small. Do you really care how many training points you have? A reasonable alternative is to use the standard error. If you use the standard error, you get the same scaling as the test error and training error. You get a better measure of how well your model fits the data than using the test error. Wednesday, August 13, 2005 I had a very interesting discussion with a professor yesterday. He mentioned that an article by Winter (2000) suggests that a well trained linear model outperforms logistic regression. I told him that I was looking at the same issue, but that I was finding a different conclusion. Winter claims that logistic regression is too complicated for many applications.
