By the time I reached 5th grade, my speech was failing me. I'd wake up, take a shower, and still find myself puking before any semblance of a social life could get under way. My parents were doing their best to help out, which only meant that I'd show up at lunch with a hangover and we'd leave the cafeteria together. Then, of course, my speech had failed me again. The cafeteria didn't really help – my parents took me back inside once the car was packed up. I'd sit at the table, eat some rice, and be miserable for the rest of the day. In the 10 years since I left home, my diagnosis of Asperger's syndrome hasn't really changed much. I'm still socially awkward, I still get hung up on details that others don't, and I'm still easily distracted. But Asperger's is more than a checklist of symptoms – I'm also getting better at being a little more empathetic to my peers' struggles. By learning to accept that I'm not normal, 77a5ca646e
