The countries of the Lands Between are in a time of recovery, but the nations of the World of Elden are preparing for war, and their ambitious battleships are being deployed. To the south, the Kingdom of Andur lies serenely on the Imperial Sea. The prosperous and optimistic Kingdom of Andur has been shaken by the tragedy of the Lifestream's overabundance. After the death of its monarch, the royal family's dual-sword balance became too heavy and brought the two countries to the brink of war. King Telorris ordered his army to seize the Elden and Andur cities to put an end to the violence and restore peace between the kingdoms. King Telorris and his successor, King Iringa, decided to control the Lifestream by using the same tactic they used against the invading Rhoshan from the west. King Telorris determined to create a new Elden city and spread the Elden race throughout the Lands Between. Andur and the other nations then had to join together to prevent this, and so began the Great War. The conflict lasted three years, and the royal armies fought with each other and with the invading Rhoshan armies, the ferocious beasts that attack from the west, and the Teharas. However, the war did not end the floods of the Lifestream. Despite fierce battles, the Rhoshan and Elden are unable to stop the continued flow of water in the World of Elden, and the seas have become emptier. The threat from the Rhoshan looms ever closer. The war was a vicious and bloody one. Although the Elden's defeat was inevitable from the start, King Telorris
