Technical Field This disclosure relates to an image capture system, and more specifically to an image capture system with an improved autofocus system. Description of the Related Art Automatic (e.g., “auto,” “auto-focus,” “auto-exposure,” etc.) capture systems of mobile devices are widely used. These systems typically use a technique known as phase-difference autofocus (PDAF) to identify a subject and set focus. In the PDAF technique, a simple contrast measurement is used to detect the contrast of a subject and then move the lens to find the optimal focus. Since a subject, for instance a person's face, has a very narrow region of contrast change, the PDAF technique often yields a focus setting that is frequently inaccurate, especially when there is low contrast (e.g., such as in a low-light condition or in a black and white image). In addition, the PDAF technique is not robust to noise and may cause false focus detections and/or cause focus to be missed. Thus, it is with respect to these considerations and others that the present invention has been made.
