Recent work by this laboratory and others has used a visual event-related potential (ERP) to demonstrate that activation of the primary visual cortex (V1) is a part of the affective response to faces. By means of visual evoked potentials (VEPs) and selective attention paradigms it will be possible to address whether regions of the cortical visual system, other than V1, are involved in the processing of emotionally-relevant stimuli. A broad research strategy will also include an exploration of the role of the medial temporal lobe in affective function using emotionally neutral stimuli.
