What makes this method so superior?Games like Doom and Quake inspire me to create some really quirky stuff. I am not a very standard artist and I didn't learned at an art school. I don't have the graphical background that other artists can boast of. I wish I could create my own background music for my.ini files and other stuff. I have my own music composer. I really like the music work of Beethoven and others. I love the old music of DOS era. When I listen to it, the same feeling of wonder the old games still can give me. I like to to write very complicated.NET system. The advantage of it is that, you can make it into a game with so many features and components. You need to be damn good at.NET, design, game mechanics, and all kinds of stuff. If you are good in these, you can code and make something unique. ... So, do you ever feel a game designer can feel the element of wonder again? Quote As we mentioned before, step 1 would be to look at the game you'd like to make. Take a look at the elements of the game. It will help you decide if this is a game you'd like to make. If you'd like to make a game like QF19, step 2 is to build a game engine or framework with such elements. As for the third, to decide the platform you'd like to make on, it depends on what element you want to make. If you'd like to make a 2D game with a character, step 3 might be to decide whether you want it to be a 2D or 3D game and how you would like to draw the character. If it's a puzzle game, step 3 might be to decide how you'll solve such a puzzle. A good game shouldn't have too d0c515b9f4
