What's new:

: 8 Ways the Right Hires Somebody They Know This is kind of kooky and full of insider baseball, but maybe you'll never see it coming. The next time you see the Hireals say a thing like, "I'm hiring a real political professional," think about the next time you see them say something like, "I'm hiring a real politician." There is no "real" here: It's a matter of opinion, of preference, of unknown. What's constant about this word is that it's a proxy. Take a recently vacated House seat. Unpopular incumbent Republican: Pro Close childhood friend: Con Hardworking, sharp former staffer: Mildly favorable Overseas political acquaintance: Pretty decent Super-uber-close friend of a close relative who the candidate knows: Well, to be honest Politico's Burgess Everett recently explained a stark and remarkable truth about politics: In 2010 and 2014 alone, we learned that 35 percent of the top 50 House fundraising bundlers came from industries that have obvious business relationships with the office that is trying to raise money. As of the close of calendar 2014, the oil and natural gas industry donated $6.1 million to candidates. When we say that they donated, we don't mean that these companies gave out a ton of money. We mean that these donors gave a ton of money. In 2010 the top 10 federal political contributors from the oil and natural gas industry each gave about $100,000. In 2014 the top 10 GOP political contributors from this industry gave between $1.1 million and $1.5 million. Of those donors, 28 percent are people who accompanied the candidate to fundraisers. This is by no means a comprehensive list; one of the major duties of campaign fundraisers is to network across industries, and it's not a task easily supervised from a distance. But the last part of that top line is eye-opening: Neighborhoods function sort of the same way: The friend of your friend's sibling-in-law has more impact than the guy who just delivered you a pizza. These aren't just relationships that are formed through ordinary life, which is sometimes shot-through with petty jealousies and misunderstandings anyway. Instead, they're the stuff of political power: Not merely "political insiders"; not merely "politics heavyweights"; not merely
