This project will develop dynamic, realistic computer simulations to enable the preclinical researcher to explore novel approaches to optimal treatment of ductal pancreatic adenocarcinoma. The preliminary work suggests that partial tumor regression could be achieved in a large proportion of patients treated by conventional radiation and chemotherapy. A combination of radiation and chemotherapy called Temozolomide represents a logical extension of this approach. This project will explore the dynamics of growth and response of ductal adenocarcinoma in order to establish a data base relevant for treatment planning and decision making. Areas to be investigated include tumor-host, tumor-stromal, and tumor-neighbor relationships. These will be explored by relating clinical data and microscopic observations to computer simulations. Experimental aspects of tumor-host interactions will focus on formation of the tumor stroma, invasion of the perivascular space, and blood-tumor barrier rupture. The stroma is a dynamic milieu, and its characteristics are important in regulating tumor growth. In this context, the stromal data will be examined in relation to growth patterns in the perivascular space. Finally, the blood-tumor barrier is a critical regulator of tumor growth, with permeability increasing in response to tumor cell proliferation. The effect of tumor-stromal interactions on blood-tumor barrier function will be explored. The project will develop methods for the simulation of dynamic histological features and will test the feasibility of modeling the tumor-neighbor relationship. A major effort will be made to utilize data generated in this program to improve the accuracy of computer simulations and to focus attention on novel approaches to treating ductal pancreatic adenocarcinoma. In summary, the project will develop comprehensive computer models for ductal pancreatic adenocarcinoma. These will be used to explore the dynamics of tumor growth and response to treatment, including a significant emphasis on tumor-stromal interactions. The capability of these programs to integrate disparate elements of the dynamic process and produce clinically relevant conclusions suggests that this approach may ultimately be useful in designing and testing novel, more effective treatment strategies. * * For the full copyright and license information, please view the LICENSE * file that was distributed with this source code. */ namespace Symfony\Component\HttpFound

Human experience has been that a simple question or request can provide a powerful unifying thread to a conversation, along with a ring of understanding and respect. In this video, the suffragette movement in the United States will be adapted to show that the civil rights movement is at its core fundamentally about citizenship. It is about the universal human experience that all humans have the right to participate in their society, and the right to participate in the political process – without fear or discrimination. The video will use the idea of the "mountain", where the mountain is a metaphor for the political system and how it affects each person. The creation of the video – involving journalists and activists from the West Midlands – will enable students to gain a deeper understanding of the civil rights movement, including why it is important to understand that everyone has a right to equal treatment and an equal voice in their society, and how the system of voting can be used to support this. The video is intended to be used across the curriculum by students in KS2 and KS3, and will be available to use in assemblies and conferences.
