Before, the Groovy and PostgreSQL extensions were implemented as 2.jar files. Now, these files are bundled together into a single.jar file. This means that you can access the functionality of PostgreSQL and Groovy using Java in one single environment. This new environment was officially announced on Google's blog in their post "Introducing CloudWorkspace: A Groovy Client for Google App Engine". The article stated that CloudWorkspace is made to be compatible with the Google App Engine (GAE) environment that allows you to build and deploy applications for GAE. The environment can also be run locally on a server, by simply downloading and running the "mvn groovy:dev" command. This new environment, in addition to its many other features, it has a set of SQL utilities to work with PostgreSQL. You can connect, change a column value, and select from a table among others. Check out the code of the.jar file for more information, or just go for the Groovy developer site and check out the tutorial. For reference, the tutorial is broken into a series of posts with lots of snippets of code that can be copied and pasted. One thing we don't like very much in this new environment is that it's not very clear how to download the pre-built files from the server. We would like to point out that this environment is being offered in beta. If you wish to try it, visit the Google CloudWorkspace website.Q: Build rules for electron app for releasing to the app store Hello friends, I have recently started with Electron and I have just learned that we need to pack electron application in a apk. We assessed the responses of the airway to histamine in anesthetized dogs after selective infusion of the peptide into the carotid artery. Graded doses of histamine were given to produce bronchoconstrictions of similar magnitudes before and after a 47% reduction of systemic blood flow; plasma histamine (which was converted to catecholamines at equimolar rates) was continuously infused to maintain histamine concentration constant. After the reduction of blood flow, the increases in airway resistance were reduced in comparison with control values, but in all dogs, the percent increases of resistance were closely linearly correlated with the histamine concentration ($r = 0.95$). The greater the fall of blood flow, the greater the reduction of slope. The slope was reduced to almost zero when blood flow was decreased to less than 20% of control value. On the other hand, further changes in airway resistance were not associated with any changes of plasma histamine concentrations. We conclude that the airway responses to histamine are closely related to plasma histamine concentrations and fall in blood flow, but that the plasma histamine concentration does not play a significant role in the direct airway responses to histamine.

Risk factors of mental disorders in adult populations of rural and urban Ecuador. To determine the prevalence of mental disorders and associated demographic, socioeconomic, psychosocial, and health determinants among the adult population of rural and urban Ecuador. The World Health Organization (WHO) standardised module of the Composite International Diagnostic Interview (CIDI) was administered to a representative sample of 1,240 subjects aged $> \text{ or } = 14$ years in rural and urban communities. Major depression, anxiety, and alcohol abuse/dependence were identified in 7.8, 6.8, and 3.2%, respectively. High blood pressure was the most prevalent physical health problem (50.7%) followed by diabetes (20.2%). Age, gender, and educational level were independent predictors of mental disorders. Gender differences were also evident for alcohol and tobacco dependence. The rates of mental disorders are higher in urban compared to rural communities, as well
